Actons In Harry Potter and the

Deathly Hallows part II, the eponymous item is a one-of-a-kind shapeshifting object given to Harry by his godfather Sirius Black. It has the form of a red box with eyeholes and a small triangle on top, and when viewed by the faithful, the Tri-wizard Cup vanishes. According to Rowling, the Tri-wizard Cup is the original wand of Harry Potter, a gift from a great-uncle on Harry's mother's side. It was passed down to Harry's father and was in the possession of Uncle Vernon. Vernon then gifted the cup to Harry's godfather, Sirius Black, who gave it to Harry. Even in the 1980s, when it was conceived and written, Rowling was worried about the legality of using the name "wand" in a film, but she had faith in Warner Bros. (The character of Cedric Diggory, later under the name Cedric Wheeler, was originally named "Cedric Crouch")

Rowling felt it was fortunate that Rowling, an atheist, gave the cup the name of a well-known Christian symbol (the cup being a Christian symbol, Catholic writers would refer to the cup as a "Holy Grail").

Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows, Part II contains the line I gave you my word that I'd give you my word that I'd pass it on to the next generation. I have done so. This passage alludes to Rowling's real-life son, David.

As a teenager, he used to attend wizarding talent shows in Leicester, where he befriended another fan of the books and the films, Rowling herself. Rowling adopted David, with the blessing of his divorced parents. David and Rowling had a son, son, and another son together. When asked about the relationship between Harry Potter and his godfather, Sirius Black, Dumbledore says in Harry Potter and the Half-Blood

Prince, "I was grateful to him. He raised my nephew, gave him his own magical experience, introduced him to the wizarding world." - Throughout the series, Sirius loves Harry, and although they don't get along, he is a role model to Harry and loves him as a sort of father figure. However, when Harry returns to Hogwarts, Sirius is furious and wants Harry to know it f678ea9f9e
