Abstract: Mobile telephony along with the Internet has enabled and enhanced new forms of human interaction by providing users with easy ways of reaching, and communicating with their loved ones regardless of distance or geographical locations. The medium has also not only become very essential to the society, but indispensable to individuals, families and social groups (Hoffman, et al, 2004). Texting has shown a great deal of promise to remain indispensable to people's communication needs across their life span. This paper examines how mobile phones support intimate personal and romantic relationships in digitally emergent places, particularly Nigeria, and argues that texting is an active and effective medium of interpersonal communication for enabling and sustaining social and romantic relationships. Applying the appraisal framework and discourse analysis, the study shows that texting is culturally motivated and provides some of the emotional support needed in personal relationships; texting is also used to express romantic feelings both within and outside of marriage. Especially among dating and married couples, texting is sometimes used in an attempt to resolving conflicts.

Data for this study comprise 217 text messages obtained from texters at different levels of heterosexual relationships, namely formal personal friendship, courtship/dating and marriage relationships. Fifty couples were interviewed to identify the specific essential roles of texting in their relationships as they form and develop, and the tendency of such roles to continue across the couples' life span.

1. Introduction

It is a common belief that effective communication, comprising honest and direct interpersonal interaction is fundamental to building and maintaining healthy relationships, as it will normally boost intimacy, improve happiness and health, as well as inspire creativity. According to Coyne et al, (2011), text messaging (or texting) has the potential to foster or heterosexual romantic relationships through enhanced interpersonal communication. Texting is said to break spatial barriers and provide the medium for lovers to keep track of each other and exchange emotional commitments (Goesll, 2008; Ellison, 2008). As to whether people actually carry their emotions with them in computer-mediated communication (CMC) at all, Chenault (1998) argues that 'emotion is present in CMC'
